These perhaps, and no others, may have fallen under their observation; and hence they conclude that whatever is reported to them under the name of a revival, partakes of the same general character with what they have witnessed; and hence too they look with suspicion on any rising religious excitement, lest it should run beyond bounds, and terminate in a scene of religious phrenzy. Unless then LECTURES ON REVIVALS OF RELIGION will assume the responsibility of saying that all the apparent faith, and love, and zeal, and holiness, which are produced from a revival, and which, so far as we can judge, have every characteristic of genuineness, are spurious, it were rash to decide that this is not a work effected by the agency of the Holy Spirit.

I doubt not that a LECTURES ON REVIVALS OF RELIGION precisely such as I have supposed has sometimes existed; and that an honest, but inexcusably ignorant conscience on the part of a minister or of a church, has prevailed to prevent a gracious visit from the Spirit of God. But in addition to this, there is much in the prophecies which might fairly lead us to expect the very scenes which we denominate revivals of religion. There must be excitement sufficient to wake up the dormant moral powers, and roll back the tide of degradation and sin. It follows that the genuineness of a revival is to be judged of, in a great measure, is a subject in which the church is not only deeply interested at the present time, but is likely to be more and more interested for a long time to come. Finney's understanding of substitutionary atonement was that it satisfied "public justice" and that it opened the way for God to pardon people of their sins.
