Cities are expanding, but services are dwindling Myanmar cities face significant challenges regarding the provision of quality water, sanitation and waste management services to their citizens. Peri-urban Water and Sanitation Services a collection of papers initially developed to support a distance-learning course at UNESCO-IHE Institute for Water Education, Delft, The Netherlands, challenges professionals to pursue water services dilemmas within a broader developmental framework that addresses issues of autonomy and accountability intrinsic to intergovernmental relations. This book draws on literature at the interface of common pool resources, co-production, new public management and political ecology to discuss important policy concerns that relate to rural-urban transformation, budget support, wastewater reuse and performance benchmarking.

The purpose of the programme, which NTU assessed, was to improve access of the target groups to reliable, affordable and sustainable quality water supply and wastewater management services in the areas services by the three beneficiary Urban Water and Sewerage Authorities UWSA. Conclusions: citizen involvement is not a simple matter but it cannot be taken lightly By some public authorities, technicians and even sometimes donors, citizen involvement is often seen as a constraint or non-useful approach.
