In AD, as in AD, peasants were still labouring away in the much the same way to feed themselves and to produce the surplus which funded everything. The 'dark ages' which followed were dark not only because written sources were few and far between, but because life became nasty, brutish and short. Even where other less important Roman institutions survived, the new kings had only much-diminished revenue rights and their armies were composed of semi-professional contingents of local landowners.

The American Thomas Edison pioneered electricity and motion picture technology. The rest was all in the rough, and called for arrangement, correction, and the verification of the references, an amount of work which his numerous engagements had probably made it impossible for him to accomplish. Also in this period, Britain ended its policy of isolation from the European continent and formed an alliance with France, called the Entente Cordiale.
