After losing a lawsuit over accusations of his homosexual behavior, Wil Jack has decided to abandon his double life. As far as the piano is concerned, sentiment is my forte.

He is an accepted upper-class gentleman, mainly because of the Cardew fortune. In the third society play, An Ideal Husband, the "fallen" character is a man instead of a woman, and although the play's resolution involves some rather disappointingly conventional ideas of the roles of husbands and wives, An Ideal Husband stands out thanks to two especially memorable characters: Lord Goring, a pleasure-seeking dandy whose ideas of the pointlessness of harsh moral judgments allow him to rescue other characters from self-sacrifice and unnecessary punishment, and Mrs.
